WOMAN'S WORLD IN PARAGRAPHS. Shall Business Women Eat Luncheon Un der Difficulties?-- Restaurants.

[Copyright by American Press Association.] Not long since I went to Chicago hurriedly, with much business to attend to in a short time. One o'clock caught myself and friend in the heart of the city, opposits a well known restaurant. We entered, following the crowd. At the door we were stopped. "Ladies are not allowed in here," said a waiter. 'This is a business man's restaurant. There is a ladies' dining room up stairs.' Up stairs we went. We took in the sitnation at a glance—a gaudy, swallow tailed waiter feeing business, waiting half an hour for the least order, with a JOE, The Hatter, grinning monkey at your clow, listenng to all you say, remarking audibly unless you get a gergeous dinner, rolling up the whites of his eyes and sneering in your face unless you give him a fee which is enough to buy your whole dinner elsewhere. I am so sick of that kind of thing that the English language cannot express my feelings. We looked witheringly at the dread presence that came ferward to smirk us into a "Is this the only place where business women can go for a baked potato and a cup of chocolate?" The smirker said it was. "And I suppose the prices are twice as much as they are down stairs?" "Yes, they are three times as much," answered the smirker. This, then, was all the great restaurant in the second largest city of the union could do for business women; charge them three More genuine fun to the square inch than any times as much as a man is charged for the same thing, when women as a rule do not even get the third of the wages paid to men, and expect them to fee the wniters besides. It is not the square thing at all, and the same conditions are to be observed in all cities. Business women have no chance at all when it comes to the noon hour. If some shrewd, capable women, clean, dainty and good ooks, would open moderate priced little restaurants in the busy portion of the

In Chicago men teachers have almost disappeared from the public schools except as principals, and the women are crowding them hard oven there. en are very successful as florists, and if they would turn their attention with zeal and sense to the business many of them would amass wealth in the course of years. The work is beautiful and healthful. A young woman florist in San Diego is doing a thriving business both in the wholesale and retail trade, while two others in another part of California are making a good living cultivating roses alone.

One of the noblest women ever born to bless and help her own sex was the late Lydia Becker, of England. She was a member of the Manchester school board, and there worked especially for the industrial education of girls. She believed that if the daughters of the poor could be made accomplished cooks and housekeepers, knowing how to sew and make the most and the best of what they had, it would go a long way toward ameliorating the condition of all. She arranged for instruction to evening classes in sewing, cooking, pursing and

And if so, I wonder if the women will still stand it and remain in the church, and like patient beasts of burden work all the harder for being kicked and cuffed?

These women who know something and have won high honors in their studies do not have to wait for opportunity to work. Helen Leah Reed, who captured the Sargent prize at Harvard last commencement, has already become literary editor of The Boston Advertiser, while Elizabeth Hodge, who distinguished herself at the Oxford examinations in England, is to become mistress of St. Mary's college at Johannesberg, South Africa.

Lady Dilke told the members of the Labor congress that she had found many girls in the chainmaking trade working seventy-five hours a week for sixty cents.
